

Advent of The Relics

Part 5: Conclusion

The analysis revealed coordinates for the drone's launch point. The moment they had them, a major raid was set in motion.

Satellite images showed rough terrain, hard to reach, but with a single access road leading in. They didn't waste a second.

They rushed to the site: Sas-hegy Természetvédelmi Terület. A helicopter went up as units pushed in from the road.

This might have been their last real chance to catch the crew before it was too late. And with every minute that passed, the air got tighter.

They breached the location and got their answer fast.

The entire crew was there. Inside were their laptops, plans, and notes on other sites, everything needed to track them, arrest them, and stop what they were about to set in motion.

It was a major win.

They did it. Operation Winter Blackout was stopped.

New Year's arrived right on time. Across Europe, squares filled with music and fireworks, people counting down with their friends, their families, their hands wrapped around warm cups and warmer shoulders. Lights stayed on. Trains kept moving. Hospitals kept humming. Nothing went dark.

Most people never knew how close it got. And that was the point.

